2109. Departmental Management and Leadership Workshop. Linking Sociology Programs to Students' Career Readiness: Strategies from Practice

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 104A, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Jeffrey Chin, Le Moyne College

Leader: Jeffrey Chin, Le Moyne College

Co-Leaders: Mary Scheuer Senter, Central Michigan University

Renee A. Monson, Hobart and William Smith Colleges

Teresa Ciabattari, Pacific Lutheran University

This workshop is designed to help department and program leaders develop strategies that will help sociology students prepare to enter the labor force successfully. Specific objectives include developing strategies to: ● Support faculty who would like to develop new courses ● Support faculty who are looking to integrate activities into existing courses ● Win over skeptical faculty Our orientation is to suggest that faculty can make these modifications in courses and curricula without reducing the rigor and analytical focus of the undergraduate major and without committing to revisions that are highly taxing in terms of faculty time or the mastery of new material. The workshop draws on research that focuses on skills that employers want (e.g., Hart Research Associates 2015, National Association of Colleges and Employers 2015), students' goals and objectives (e.g., Eagan et al. 2017) and sociology graduates' first labor market experiences (e.g., Senter et al. 2015). This workshop builds on the material published in The Sociology Major in the Changing Landscape of Higher Education (Pike et al. 2017) and much of it draws from an article forthcoming in Teaching Sociology, "Sociology Majors and Labor Market Success" (Ciabattari et al. under review).

Facing Feelings While Teaching Race: The Importance of Emotional Competence in Building Cultural Competence in the Classroom Sandra Joy, Rowan University

This session will examine the racialized emotions that faculty feel when teaching courses on race and racism. Drawing upon Harlow's work on emotion management (2003) while using a collaborative autoethnographic approach (Chang et al. 2012), four faculty members from racially diverse backgrounds will collectively explore the good, the bad, and the ugly emotions we feel when teaching about race and racism. We will examine how these emotions: 1) shape our behavior in and out of the classroom; 2) influence our relationships not only with our students but in our personal lives; 3) affect our overall physical and mental health; and 4) are managed and performed to protect our status in the Academy.

2118. Professional Development Workshop. Job Market Workshop

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizers: Bianca Manago, Indiana University
Amy Kroska, University of Oklahoma

Leader: Amy Kroska, University of Oklahoma

It is important for all students to have as much information as possible before entering the job market. Currently, there is no job market workshop at ASA. This workshop would be immensely useful to students who are entering and preparing for the job market, given that many early sociologists are the first in their families and social circles to go through the academic job market process. Similarly, most graduate programs do not have formal structures in place that properly prepare students for the job market. By hosting this workshop, we would help prepare students for both the industrial and academic job market, and hopefully reduce some of the inequality that stems from a paucity of information and/or cultural capital.

2120. Thematic Session. Feeling Race in School Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111B, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Amanda Evelyn Lewis, University of Illinois at Chicago

Presider: Amanda Evelyn Lewis, University of Illinois at Chicago

Panelists: Prudence L. Carter, University of California-Berkeley
Roslyn A. Mickelson, University of North Carolina-Charlotte

This session will explore the conference theme through a close examination of schools, a key social institution that is a major arena both of socialization and stratification. Race is felt in schools on multiple levels including structural, cultural, social psychological and interactional. Where schools are located, how they are organized and funded, how attendance patterns are created, how students are assigned to classes, how textbooks are written have all historically been racialized processes. But schools don't merely generate or mitigate racial inequality, they also generate identities and emotions. Scholars on this panel will discuss the many ways that race is felt in schools both indirectly and directly – providing or constraining opportunity and also shaping students' sense of self and relationship to the world.

Building on scholarship that explores the relationship between neoliberalism and colorblind racism, this panel will analyze the complex entanglements of racism and capitalism in the contemporary world. How do neoliberal projects articulate with efforts to restructure racial, colonial, and imperial domination? The dynamics are complex and contradictory: shifts in the racial composition of middle and upper classes alongside the deepening exploitation and abandonment of the racialized poor; a resurgence of virulent white supremacy amid continued denials of structural racism; formal legal equality coupled with racialized policing and exclusionary state violence. As elites attempt to expand relations of domination and exploitation, crises open new terrain for local and transnational struggles against racism, capitalism, and heteropatriarchy. Bringing together scholars who analyze the racial dynamics of neoliberalism in the US and around the world, this panel will focus on the following questions: (1) What theoretical frames do you find most productive for analyzing the shifting configurations of racism and capitalism in the contemporary world? (2) What are the most sophisticated or dangerous new formations of racial neoliberalism/neoliberal racism? (3) Where do you see openings or spaces for opposing, escaping, or subverting these formations?

2175. Special Session. Neighborhood Effects in the Age of Big Data

Philadelphia Marriott Downtown, Franklin Hall 11, Level 4, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Corina Graif, Pennsylvania State University

Panelists: Christopher R. Browning, Ohio State University

Robert J. Sampson, Harvard University

John R. Hipp, University of California-Irvine

Andrew V. Papachristos, Northwestern University

Decades of research suggest that neighborhood disadvantage negatively affects individuals' behavior and outcomes. Yet, studies like the Moving to Opportunity, a large field experiment in five US cities, showed that moving families from high- to low- poverty neighborhoods increased rather than decreased risky behavior among some youth. The proposed panel will address this and other similarly puzzling findings and connect them to two critical weaknesses of conventional neighborhood research: a) the assumption that residential neighborhoods function independently of each other - ignoring risk factors in areas away from home where people interact with others; and b) as importantly, insufficient understanding of neighborhood mechanisms and heterogeneity in causal effects. The panelists will systematically discuss these and related critical barriers in the field together with possible solutions using recent advancements in Big Data analytics and computational social science. In order to model hidden interdependencies among individuals and neighborhoods and operationalize underlying mechanisms, sociologists are beginning to bring together multiple large scale datasets with varied content, and complex structures like network and spatial interdependencies, and match them to more traditional representative survey and observational data -- with implications for the future of sociological research on neighborhood effects. The proposed panelists are distinguished scholars from different universities and come from different backgrounds and perspectives. They have written extensively on the subject of neighborhood effects, ecological networks, networks and geography, inter-neighborhood interactions and dependencies, social distance, and social capital -- and are pushing the boundaries of sociology in this rapidly growing area.

2177. Professional Development Workshop. Bringing Socio-Economics Statistics Close to Home: Using State and Local Census Data in the Classroom

Philadelphia Marriott Downtown, Franklin Hall 13, Level 4, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizers: Joe Quartullo, U.S. Census Bureau

Noemi Mendez, U.S. Census Bureau

This professional development, hands-on workshop will introduce and expand upon the U.S. Census Bureau's easily accessible data tools, with an emphasis on social and economic data at the state and local levels. It will include a brief history of the decennial census, list on-going census bureau surveys, explain census geographic concepts, and clarify available data sets (i.e 1 yr. vs. 5 yr, etc.). Participants will have an opportunity to access, edit and transpose tables and create thematic maps using state or local data from the Census Bureau's most prolific survey, The American Community Survey. Race, Ethnicity and Ancestry data will be highlighted in accordance with the conference theme. Data tools such as Quickfacts, the American Factfinder, My Congressional District, On the Map, and the newest tool, census.gov will be introduced. Laptops recommended. Information on future training sessions and workshops will be provided.

This session will examine the politics of racial identity among Caribbeans in the United States. Despite their long trajectories of migration to the United States, and numerical weight, this group has not been at the center of dominant theorizations of race in the U.S. With presentations from scholars working on communities with roots in the Anglophone and Hispanophone Caribbean, this panel will analyze how these communities make sense of themselves within, through and outside of U.S. racial classification systems and U.S. racial politics. In focusing on these communities, each with their own unique histories of migration and colonization, this thematic session seeks to understand the emotions surrounding ethno-racial identity and experiences for U.S.-based Caribbeans and their descendants. In this, the panelist will address some of the questions raised in sociology for decades around how these communities identify, how they experience race and racism, the extent to which they feel close to other ethno-racial groups, and if/when they mobilize around ethno-racial identities. This question around political participation is particularly salient today as these processes of racial formation are unfolding amidst the increasing politicization of race with the emergence of the movement for black lives and movements against the criminalization of immigrant

Discussant: Sarah Neal, University of Sheffield

This proposed thematic session aims to examine the ways in which local, ethnically and socially diverse urban populations relate to the places, localities and neighbourhoods in which their everyday life happens. In particular panellists will focus on quotidian social and sustainability practices and social interactions between proximate multicultural populations within particular urban environments. In this context speakers will bring together research which explores people's micro geographies of the places in which they live and discuss the ways these are shaped by affection, comfort and presence on the one hand and avoidance, anxiety and exclusion on the other. What are the factors, experiences and values that shape social relations to multicultural localities and in what ways do racialized reputations of places and neighbourhoods play a part in these? The three panellists will address and expand on these themes and questions through their work in very different national contexts of urban multicultural but each sharing a preoccupation with the interconnection between the social and the spatial. Drawing on their own work in the area the discussant will offer a comparative reflexive analysis across the presentations.

This session focuses on how the election of Barack Obama as President of the United States offered a promise of social and political change within the country. However, this positively held belief by many Americans did not usher us into what some believed might be a post racial/political society. Thus, we are left with questions of race and change in the 21st century, like the issues we faced during the 20th century and the new doubling down of once hidden know seen issues associated with race and ethnicity.

2218. Policy and Research Workshop. Public Launch and Training for Sociological use of MIDFIELD Dataset on Undergraduate Student Persistence

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Michelle Madsen Camacho, University of San Diego

Co-Leaders: Susan Lord, University of San Diego, Engineering
Matthew Ohland, Purdue University

This workshop represents a public launch of a longitudinal database of individual student records at 100 institutions across the USA. In this workshop participants will be provided with context to understand the potential of the database, explore research with this resource, and learn how to access the database. Originally funded to understand disparities in student outcomes for undergraduates in Science, Technology, Engineering and Math (STEM) majors (primarily engineering), the dataset has been continuously funded by the National Science Foundation for 30 years, rendering a unique census of undergraduate student persistence over time in all majors. Sociologists working on issues of inequities in education, particularly STEM education, will benefit from learning how to access and use these data. The name of the database is the "Multiple-Institution Database for Investigating Engineering Longitudinal Development" (MIDFIELD). MIDFIELD is a comprehensive resource that contains a wealth of student unit-record data including demographic, enrollment, course performance, and graduation data obtained directly from partner universities. The data are de-identified, clean, coded, and curated into sociological categories. The National Science Foundation encourages public use of this dataset through partnerships and data use agreements; there are no fees associated with access or use of the MIDFIELD dataset. After the workshop, participants will have achieved the following learning objectives: -Describe longitudinal NSF database called MIDFIELD, and understand its potential for understanding diversity in academic persistence of students by group, and across time and space. - Demonstrate previous findings from this database -Identify new sociological questions that could be answered with MIDFIELD -Outline process to join and access MIDFIELD The format of this workshop will incorporate a multi-method-, active-learning approach with small group work, and a participatory format.

Blogging has become an increasingly powerful vehicle for sociologists to write about critical social issues for both popular and academic audiences.

The traditional repositories for our writing are professional journals or reports. Most often, this type of writing is vetted and judged, and there are fairly clear "guidelines" that frame what and how we write. Blogging takes us out of this realm, providing a freer landscape for writing about what you know and what you care about. Speakers on this panel will discuss why they have chosen to blog and what they blog about, how their blog writing differs from their academic writing, ways to use blogs in and out of the classroom, responses bloggers get from their posts, and ways in which blog writing can potentially lead to other opportunities.

Philadelphia Marriott Downtown, Franklin Hall 9, Level 4, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Kathrin Zippel, Northeastern University
Leader: Sharyn Potter, University of New Hampshire

While some of us have become targets of sexual misconduct, many more of us become witnesses of incidents in various professional settings including academic conferences that are not always easy to interpret. Furthermore, we are often at a loss of what we can or should do about these. This workshop is directed at undergraduate and graduate students, researchers, and professors alike. Sharyn J. Potter, Professor of Sociology and Executive Director of the Prevention Innovations Research Center at the University of New Hampshire will provide an overview of the problem of sexual and relationship violence, stalking and harassment in academia. We will use case studies including scenarios at academic conferences to teach attendees how to identify problematic situations. Dr. Potter will facilitate interactive exercises to teach participants how to intervene as engaged bystanders before, during and after instances of sexual and relationship violence, stalking and harassment. Proposed Session Objectives: * Participants will be able to identify a continuum of inappropriate sexual behavior. * Participants will develop empathy for those who have experienced sexual and relationship violence, stalking and harassment. * Participants will understand the concept of bystander intervention. * Participants will understand their role in bystander intervention and make a commitment to intervene in cases of sexual and relationship violence, stalking and harassment before, during and after an incident. * Participants will apply the concept of bystander responsibility to sexual and relationship violence, stalking and harassment.

2309. Policy and Research Workshop. Video Data Analysis: How to Employ Data from YouTube, Body Cameras, and CCTV for Sociological Analysis
Pennsylvania Convention Center, 104A, Level 100, 12:30-2:10pm

Session Organizers: Nicolas Martin Legewie, German Institute for Economic Research (DIW Berlin)
Anne Nassauer, Freie Universität Berlin

Since the early 2000s, the proliferation of cameras, whether in mobile phones or CCTV, body cameras, or drones, has led to an explosion in visual recordings of human behavior. More and more of such data is uploaded online on YouTube and other sharing platforms. This vast pool of data enables new approaches to analyzing human behavior and situational dynamics in a variety of social phenomena. Such data especially provides the opportunity to study emotions during social interactions, such as racialized encounters. The workshop leaders have developed a methodological framework for using novel types of video data to analyze human behavior and situational dynamics: Video Data Analysis (VDA). A paper outlining this framework has been conditionally accepted for publication in Sociological Methods & Research. The proposed workshop will offer an introduction to and applied exercises in VDA. The goal is to introduce research opportunities, provide basic analytic tools, and give the opportunity to apply them in an exercise session. Thereby, the workshop will enable participants to make use of the exponentially growing, easily accessible pools of visual data for social science research. The workshop will consist of a short introductory lecture, which provides an overview over approaches analyzing visual data, and introduces the analytic potential of novel visual data types. Moreover, we will briefly discuss developments in software tools for video analysis, as well as ethical and legal issues of using video data retrieved online. In a second part, participants will complete exercises in small groups. Participants will go through the process of data collection and video data analysis step by step by using examples. Through these exercises, participants will get a feel for the challenges and potentials of using visual data for social science research. In a last part, the group will discuss their experiences during the exercise.

Session Organizer: Victor M. Rios, University of California-Santa Barbara

Discussants: Prudence L. Carter, University of California-Berkeley

Victor M. Rios, University of California-Santa Barbara

The Pushouts interrogates crucial questions of race, class and power in the education system. It is a film about the work Sociologist Victor Rios conducted with a group of youths from Watts (Los Angeles). These young people had all been kicked out of school; his research team was trying to figure out a way to help them get back into school while pushing the school system to change the way they were disciplining kids. The film attempts to create a conversation about racial inequality in education by exposing the day-to-day experiences of marginalized young people. Racial inequality in education and reform in education cannot be understood without understanding how the punitive school policies impact the day-to-day lives of young people and how these young people's voices provide key insight on how we might change this system.

The relationship between race and emotions has often been studied by focusing on marginalized groups, emphasizing the burdens of race-based emotional labor and the impact of racial micro aggressions. In this panel, we make power more visible by highlighting the ways that white supremacy structures the emotional experiences of whites. The panel will address how racialized economies of emotions ultimately reflect and reinforce white supremacy, and it will explore the role of affective labor and affective capital in this process. Taken together, the panelists offer new avenues that connect race and emotion more explicitly to power and centralize the role of emotion in the emergence and maintenance of racial projects.

Session Organizer: Corrie Grosse, College of Saint Benedict & Saint John's University

Co-Leaders: Summer Marie Gray, University of California-Santa Barbara
John Foran, University of California

This workshop will argue that U.S. sociologists must do more to incorporate the climate crisis into our research agendas and critically, into our teaching. After laying out the gravity of the situation we issue a call for sociologists to take up this responsibility in our roles as knowledge producers, teachers, and members of civil society. We then present three ways that we have infused our understanding of climate change, climate crisis, and climate justice into courses on global issues, social movements, inequality, and much more. We believe that "climate justice" – the key concept that drives our concern as scholar-activists working closely with undergraduate students – allows for a proper sociological emphasis on structured inequality and relational/intersectional thinking. The workshop also points participants to resources that we have created, and invites them to contribute to a new project on writing case studies for teaching the climate crisis. We invite faculty, graduate students, and undergraduates interested in communicating the sociological dimensions of climate crisis to participate.

The call for "public sociology" by Michael Burawoy, among many others, has initiated a lively debate about what the term means and its relationship to "professional" social science. Yet, more than a decade on from Burawoy's call, the discipline is just now beginning to help equip scholars who want to venture into the public sphere with the skills necessary to do such work. Arlene Stein and Jessie Daniels' Going Public describes itself as a guidebook for "doing" public sociology and offers nuts-and-bolts advice about how exactly to move research into public arenas (Daniels co-edited and contributed to the ASA's Promoting Sociological Research Toolkit). While there are numerous guides for producing scholarly work, Going Public is expressly dedicated to moving scholarly work out of academia and into the public sphere, focusing on writing and on using digital media tools. The book seeks to help academic social scientists develop the tools for translating their work into different arenas. It also reflects on the hazards of scholarly engagement in increasingly polarized political contexts and in an era when scholars are regularly called upon to justify and legitimize our work. The traditional model of public sociology envisions the "scholar-as-expert," and holder of privileged insight. Such a model assumes that academics and the lay public exist in separate spheres and relies on journalists to act as a bridge between those worlds, translating scholarly work for lay audiences. Going Public nods to this model but expands the scope of what it means to be engaged with a wider audience by recognizing the rise of social media, which has blurred the boundaries between academia and journalism. Today, as more and more scholars have their own social media presence, many of us are more likely to be translators and disseminators of our own research. Changes in higher education writ large, such as the sharp decline of tenure-track jobs, alongside attacks on faculty from politicians and the cultural Right, are altering the relationship between "outside" and "inside" the academy, making public sociology more crucial than ever. In this panel, a number of distinguished and early career practitioners of public sociology will evaluate whether Going Public lives up to its promise. Together, we will consider the tools and strategies we need to realize the promise of public sociology, along with considerations of the perils of engagement. And, we will consider how publicly engaged scholars might challenge dominant understandings of the role of social science knowledge in an open society.

Now, more than ever, we need a public sociology to address mechanisms of inequality and spur social change. The form that public sociology takes can vary, and ranges from bringing scientific insights to public forums such as the news, courts, and public policy initiatives. In this special session, we discuss how sociological research can productively impact the design of digital tools used by people every day. Partnerships between social scientists and technologists can lead to the development of digital tools that innovate solutions to social challenges faced by people around the world. To explore this topic, we assemble a panel of scholars who have considerable experience not only studying intersections of digital technology use and equity but who have also partnered with technologists to make design recommendations for social good. Our panelists' research centers on the relationship between digital technology adoption and sociological considerations of education, disability, race-ethnicity, class, and gender. They will discuss how they have translated their work into design-facing recommendations for the development of digital technologies. As part of this discussion, panelists will reflect on both the challenges and opportunities for social scientists to support digital innovation as part of a public sociological agenda.

The gun issue continues to be a divisive issue in the U.S. Even the left are divided as evident by the middle-ground position taken by Bernie Sanders. Leaving gun control legislation in the hands of state government, we have a growing movement for and against allowing guns on university campuses. Shootings in schools, nightclubs, airports, and other public areas present safety issues. Efforts range from time-limits to background checks to keep guns away from populations deemed unsafe or irrational and regulating the types of guns entering the general population. Other efforts are made toward holding gun manufacturers liable. Panelists are asked to share their own experiences in fighting the gun issue at their university and in sharing their research on the gun issue.

This workshop will introduce potential users to a restricted-use digital archive of American Sociological Review manuscripts and reviews from 1990 through 2010, give examples of how to use it, and help participants to develop questions and techniques for analysis. Scholars who want to develop their ability to use a brand-new data set to study the history of sociology, the sociology of knowledge, intellectual history, the dynamics of formal organizations, social stratification, and, most broadly, the ways power and knowledge interact to determine "what can be said" about a topic at any given moment will want to participate in this workshop. This digital archive was created by the American Sociological Association and the Center for Social Science Research at the George Mason University that includes 8,441 manuscripts, with attendant reviews, information on authors and reviewers that can be analyzed by researchers. Unlike, any other study of academic work, limited to published articles, this archive contains both published and unpublished manuscripts, so that archive users can study patterns of acceptance and rejection, frequencies of author and reviewer who submit to the journal, their race/ethnicity, and gender and their network relationships Specific Learning Goals 1. Understanding the Structure and Content of the Digital Archive. 2. Formulating research questions that can be answered using the digital archive(e.g.) • What intellectual orientations, major paradigms and methods of the discipline became more or less visible during these important decades? • How has the composition of manuscript submitters changed by race, ethnicity, gender, and institutional affiliation? • Do the manuscript reviewers reflect a disciplinary elite who act as gatekeepers to the journal? 3. Learning how to answer specific research questions by manipulating the variables and files in the archive. This workshop will introduce potential users to a restricted-use digital archive of American Sociological Review manuscripts and reviews from 1990 through 2010, give examples of how to use it, and help participants to develop questions and techniques for analysis. Learning how to answer specific research questions by manipulating the variables and files in the archive. Participants will receive codebooks and examples of how to answer specific questions. The co-facilitators of the workshop (James Witte, George Mason University, Roberta Spalter-Roth, American Sociological Association (ASA) and George Mason University, Yukiko Furuya, George Mason University, and Jean Shin, ASA) will aid participants in developing research questions of interest to them and how these questions can be answered using the digital archives.

Session Organizer: Nicholas A. Jones, U.S. Census Bureau

Panelists: Jennifer Lee, Columbia University

Julie A. Dowling, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

C. Matthew Snipp, Stanford University

Nicholas A. Jones, U.S. Census Bureau

By the 2018 ASA Annual Meeting, the plans for the 2020 Census race/ethnicity question will be solidified, following a decades long effort to examine potential new question designs with several national-level empirical research studies, consultations with experts, advisors, and stakeholder organizations, deliberations with federal statistics agencies, and ultimately decisions by the U.S. Office of Management and Budget on the ways in which race/ethnicity categories and questions should be utilized. This session will explore the framing of the 2020 Census race/ethnicity question and discuss the categories and detailed groups that are presented on the form and how these relate to feeling race and feeling validated. Panelists will discuss what this ultimately means individual and community recognition, and how all Americans from myriad background can report their diverse identities on the census and see them validated through the production of 2020 Census results that illustrate a snapshot of who we are as a diverse country and how we are changing.

2416. Thematic Session. Interracial Marriage, Interracial Intimacies, and Multiracial Identities: A Global Perspective

2418. Policy and Research Workshop. Workshop on Disability Measures and Data

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 2:30-4:10pm

Session Organizer: Barbara M. Altman, Disability Statistics Consultant

Co-Leader: Sharon N. Barnartt, Gallaudet University

This workshop focuses on quantitative measures of disability available in American national data. Its goals are to further interest in, and capability for, disability-specific research as well as to spur research which includes disability as one often ignored component of intersectionality. In order to accomplish these goals, the workshop will differentiate among disability measures used in national federal surveys to help researchers to pick the best measures for their particular questions. We will review the major national federal surveys that include measures of disability, highlight the kinds of questions and answer categories and relate the questions to the WHO International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health in order to differentiate their role in the disability process. We will also evaluate the measures within the framework of intersectionality in order to foster inclusion of disability as part of intersectionality research. Agenda: 1. Current conceptualization and operationalization of disability: Medical Conditions; Impairments; Physical and Social Functioning; Employment and/or Participation 2. How do these various measures interact with the International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health 3. Review of major Federal surveys: American Community Survey; CPS; NHIS; MEPS; a. Questions and answer categories in the various Federal Surveys – what is captured what is not captured b. Empirical questions that can and cannot be addressed c. Intersectionality and its relationship with disability d. Variables of interest to intersectionality topic 4. At least ½ hour will be spent discussing individual's data needs and which question sets best address inclusion of the disabled population.

2422. Teaching and Learning Symposium. Workshop on Handling Controversial Topics in a Controversial Era

2423. Professional Development Workshop. Becoming an Effective Policy Advocate

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 113B, Level 100, 2:30-

4:10pm

Session Organizer: Julie C. Netherland, Drug Policy Alliance
Co-Leader: Jessie Daniels, City University of New York-Hunter College and The Graduate Center

In the age of “alternative facts” and “post truth,” the role of academics in policy debates is more important than ever. Unfortunately, few academics have been trained in how to be effective policy advocates, and there are often institutional barriers that make it difficult for them to engage in advocacy. Drawing on one of the facilitator's years of experience in on-the-ground drug policy reform and the other's expertise on public scholarship, this workshop will provide participants with information about how policy really gets made and the unique role of scholars in advancing policy reform. The workshop will cover: the role of researchers in influencing policy, strategies for engaging and developing relationships with key policymakers, working with advocacy groups to generate new legislation and/or support existing policy campaigns, using the media to advance reform, and the function of research in a “post-truth,” “alternative facts” policy environment. The workshop will also address how to overcome common obstacles to participating in policy advocacy, including lack of time and institutional incentives for doing so.

Public engagement requires us to build new networks and relationships with partners who often have as much to teach us, as we them. To communicate effectively, we need to clarify what parts of our research are best to share, understand the rules of the game and cultures of the worlds we are seeking to move into, and learn how our research can be relevant and of use to those we hope to engage. This workshop will cover relationship building, "message" development, and tips for engaging public audiences through writing and public speaking.

Do Foreign Firms Change Culture? Evidence from Female Executives and Firms in the GCC Alessandra L. Gonzalez, University of Chicago

Across Muslim majority countries there is an exploding youth population, and increasing female achievement in tertiary education. At the same time, many Muslim majority countries have some of the lowest rates of female labor force participation and women have separate legal rights from men in various spheres of life including legal status, labor laws, and access to healthcare. If economic independence brings women more agency in the household and in society, what obstacles and challenges do women face in an effort to participate equally in the labor force? What role do firms, NGOs, and the public sector have in fostering cultural change if they are willing to hire more women into the labor force? The panel will analyze these and more questions of the political economy of women's work in a variety of Muslim majority cultural contexts.

A Critical Interrogation of Anti-Black Racism and White Supremacy Under Late Capitalism Rose Brewer, University of Minnesota

W.E.B. Du Bois conceptualized white supremacy as a global phenomenon propagated through colonialism. But what if we were to go further back to pre-colonial times? How has the concept of the "other" evolved into and within its racialized forms and how does that influence the emergence of inequalities? This double-question lies at the heart of the research presented by the panelists. The panel approaches this question from four different angles. The first is through the use of social evolution theory to explain the global historical evolution of "other-ing". Given that politics play a key role in this evolution, Habermasian discourse could become crucial so as to not resort to death squads. The second is a materialist approach that places anti-black racism in the context of 21st century capitalism. The third is through an empirical comparative-historical analysis that demonstrates how white anti-racism exposes the limitations of privilege-based approaches in the discourse on racism. The fourth explains the dominance of racialized empathy structures over formal legal ones in establishing society's deserving and undeserving. This is explored concretely through the colonial determinants of social security. The panel aims to deepen our understanding of the burgeoning discourse on race and emotions and gives a new global perspective on the sociology of race and inequalities.

The 2017 presidential election brought to public attention the emotions of economic loss, political disenfranchisement, and alienation felt by many formerly manufacturing or extractive communities in middle America. Prevalent narratives of postindustrial communities are often one dimensional, erring towards either grim declension or naïve nostalgia for a golden past. This special session invites papers from current empirical studies of post-industrial and re-industrializing extractive and manufacturing communities. These papers will probe the complexities of individual and corporate experiences of political engagement, cultural negotiation, and economic rationality and irrationality in the American Rust Belt

Given the widespread interest in how to stop sexual harassment in professional associations and universities, this panel discusses what we know from research on how to stop harassment from occurring in particular in professional associations. While many organizations have institutionalized policies, training programs, and grievance procedures over the past decades, harassment has not been eliminated. Researchers will address how sexual harassment occurs in professional associations. Drawing on research on and experiences with harassment prevention in workplace organizations, we will discuss what steps professional associations can do to promote a professional, learning and working environment free of harassment. Alexandra Kalev, Sociology, Tel Aviv University and Frank Dobbin, Sociology, Harvard University. "Does Harassment Prevention Prevent Harassment? Evidence from Academia." We expect that successful harassment prevention programs will reduce voluntary workforce exit by female faculty members, leading to increased faculty diversity. We test this proposition with data from 667 colleges and universities for the period 1993 to 2015, examining whether adoption of harassment prevention training and harassment grievance systems reduces voluntary departures of women. Justine E. Tinkler, PhD, Sociology, University of Georgia. "Promising Practices for Professional Associations for the Prevention of Sexual Harassment" The common practices of enforcement of sexual harassment laws through training and policies in organizations have encountered widespread resistances. My research explains why approaches to training and policies often have unintended outcomes or outright fail. Drawing on current research, I will discuss "promising practices" that organizations such as professional associations can take to prevent harassment from occurring. Erika Marin-Spiotta, Geography, University of Wisconsin, Madison: "Responding to hostile climates in the earth and space sciences, lessons from the American Geophysical Union (AGU) and the ADVANCEGeo Partnership" The earth, space and environmental sciences (or geosciences) is one of the least diverse fields in STEM in the news with several high-profile cases of sexual harassment. I will describe efforts and lessons learned by NSF-funded ADVANCEGeo Partnership how to improve work climate conditions and scientific societies to codify professional behavior, with the example of the AGU, which recently revised its code of conduct to include harassment, bullying and discrimination as research misconduct.

Session Organizer: Diane M. Sicotte, Drexel University

President: Diane M. Sicotte, Drexel University

Panelists: Len Albright, Northeastern University

Joan Maya Mazelis, Rutgers University-Camden

John Edward Balzarini, Delaware State University

This session features four presenters, each focused on one aspect of inequality in the Philadelphia area. Diane Sciotte's work from her recent book focuses on inequality in the distribution of environmental hazards in the Philadelphia area, and how inequality since 1970 was shaped by new environmental laws occurring simultaneously with deindustrialization, impoverishment and racial inequality; Len Albright will discuss recent patterns in housing segregation and affordability in the South Jersey region, with a focus on the Fair Share Doctrine in NJ, a statewide inclusionary zoning effort aimed at socio-economic integration; Joan Maya Mazelis will present findings from her new book, which features in-depth interviews with poor people in Philadelphia's Kensington neighborhood, in which the Kensington Welfare Rights Union (KWRU) has forged mutually supportive relationships between members that allow people to survive the worst consequences of dire poverty. Finally, John Balzarini will discuss his work on gentrification and how it drives neighborhood inequality.
