- 4107. Meeting. Journal of Health and Social Behavior Editorial Board
Pennsylvania Convention Center, 103B, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am
- 4109. Teaching Workshop. Using the Curriculum Mapping Tool for Sociology to Assess Program Strengths Within the ASA's Recommendations for the Undergraduate Major Pennsylvania Convention Center, 104A, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Stephen A. Sweet, Ithaca College
Co-Leader: Susan J. Ferguson, Grinnell College
Panelists: Kieran Bezila, Beloit College

David Boden

Charlotte A. Kunkel, Luther College

Erik W. Larson, Macalester College

Wade Roberts, Colorado College

The American Sociological Association's report The Sociology Major in the Changing Landscape of Higher Education (Pike et al. 2017) articulates 12 recommendations for the undergraduate sociology major, including the application of learning objectives from the Sociological Literacy Framework (Ferguson and Carbonaro 2016). When parsed out, recommendations actually require departments to consider and evaluate 70 program design facets. To assist program evaluation and refinement, Ferguson and Sweet developed the Curriculum Mapping Tool for Sociology (CMTS), an instrument that can provide an effective summary of curricular strengths and weaknesses. The need for the application of the CMTS is evidenced by not only the complexity of reviewing program offerings, but also by the observation that many existing programs do not fully conform to the ASA's recommendations for the undergraduate major (Sweet, McElrath and Kain 2014). This workshop demonstrates how the CMTS operates and makes the service available to all participants, including the receipt of customized reports that they can share with colleagues. In addition, presenters from different departments will discuss how they used the customized CMTS reports to engage their colleagues in reflections on the need for, and strategies of, revising the sociology major.

4110. Section on Economic Sociology. Finance and Its Challengers

Discussant: Les Back, Goldsmiths College

Critical race scholarship has uncovered several ways in which race shapes and is shaped by urban space, (infra)structures, spatial closures and experiences. While critical criminology, race theory and policy studies have stressed the significance of race in patterns of law enforcement, police violence, geographical locations, housing types and conditions, as well as access to transport and social services, critical geographers have examined the "the sense of place" i.e. the multiple arrays of emotions and feelings attached to specific places, including cities. In this session we aim for contributions that draw on and develop distinctly sociological theories and perspectives that add to understanding of the intersections between cities, race and emotions and feelings attached to urban places and spaces, drawing on a range of methodologies and locations. We address the following and related questions: How does race function as a medium through which cities and/or portions of the urban space are emotionally experienced? Reversely, how do cities function as loci of emotional attachment through which race becomes relevant in both beneficial and exclusionary ways? How to study a (post)racial sense of place, in which intimacies and anonimities of contemporary urban life connect, merge and clash? What are the markers of space and place that shape senses of cities as racialized? In what ways do typically urban cultural forms, such as busking, hip hop music and street art, help to connect racial and post-racial sensibilities?

4115. Thematic Session. Feeling Race in Our Genes

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 108B, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Dorothy E. Roberts, University of Pennsylvania

Presider: Dorothy E. Roberts, University of Pennsylvania

The Genetics of White Pride Joan M. Donovan, Data & Society Research Institute

Discussant: Dorothy E. Roberts, University of Pennsylvania

Conceiving of race as inherited biology has not only helped to justify and maintain the racial order, but also has helped to infuse race with emotional content. Since the mapping of the human genome, biological scientists are increasingly defining race as a genetic category while biotechnology companies are marketing race-based genetic products. This session will explore how the emerging racial science and technology are producing racialized feelings that affect attitudes about racial difference, domination, and solidarity. The session panelists will explore how religious beliefs about race have shaped contemporary feelings about racial genetics, how the belief in the infallibility of DNA databases in identifying suspects is shaped by emotionally charged narratives of race and crime, how African Americans use ancestry testing to fill the emotional gap left by the slave trade and to create high-tech forms of solidarity, and how white supremacist groups rely on genetic racial theories and tests to shore up white pride.

4116. Thematic Session. Life in a New America: Race Relations and Identities beyond the Black-White Binary
Pennsylvania Convention Center, 109AB, Level 100, 8:30-10:10am

Session Organizer: Jennifer Lee, Columbia University

Hyper-Selectivity and Asian Racial Mobility Van C. Tran, Columbia University

The United States is more ethnographically diverse than at any point in our history. Latinos and Asians have more than quadrupled in size from 4 and 1 percent of the U.S. population in 1965 to 18 and 6 percent, respectively, today. Latinos are now the largest minority group, and Asians, the fastest growing group in the country. Despite the new diversity, too often, research continues to be framed within a Black-White binary. This thematic session pushes beyond this stale dichotomy, and challenges us to consider how immigration and America's new diversity affect contemporary race relations and identities.

4118. Teaching Workshop. Feeling Intersectionality, Social Construction and Pedagogy

Session Organizer: Rodney D. Coates, Miami University

Presider: Rodney D. Coates, Miami University

Panelists: Rodney D. Coates, Miami University

Abby L. Ferber, University of Colorado-Colorado Springs

David L. Brunsmas, Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State

The socially constructed categories of race/ethnicity, gender/sexuality, and class/social status are fluid, not static. The intersection(s) of these categories take varied forms operating both within and across institutional structures, and always situated within specific historical and spatial contexts. We will present our own Social Matrix framework which embraces the nuance and complexity of identity and systems of inequality. Specific identities, such as race, may be centered and examined through the lens of the intersectional matrix. The purpose of this session is to explore this approach in practice. We will examine the construction of race and the reproduction of racism within specific institutional settings. We shall conclude by suggesting future directions for teaching and studying race.

4120. Thematic Session. White Fragility, White Tears: Managing White Emotions in Critical Discussions of Race

Session Organizers: Ainsley Lambert-Swain, University of Cincinnati

James Michael Thomas, University of Mississippi

Panelist: Joyce M. Bell, University of Minnesota

Epidermal Capital and Challenging Whiteness Sarah Mayorga-Gallo, University of Massachusetts-Boston

Rather than centering the voices and experiences of people of color, whites' emotions often derail critical dialogue and silence people of color, thereby maintaining the status quo. Anger, guilt, frustration, fear, and literal tears are just some of the emotions whites express in critical discussions of race and racial inequality. We see this fragility exhibited by our students in our classrooms, as well as by our colleagues, both within the discipline and beyond. This thematic session aims to explore how the emotions and behaviors of whites can diminish and dilute discussions of racial inequality, and how whites can be more effective allies in the struggle for racial justice.

4122. Section on Community and Urban Sociology Refereed Roundtables

Online platforms provide an opportunity for scholars to "get the word out" about their research and to do so in ways that engage a variety of academic and non-academic audiences. This professional development workshop will help attendees learn to more effectively use both online and offline platforms to promote their research. Topics of discussion will include developing personal websites and blogs, using Twitter, Facebook and Instagram, writing guest blog posts and op-eds, sharing preprints in open archives, and engaging practitioners and policymakers with scholarly research. The workshop will feature presentations by sociologists who are leading the way both in sharing their own research and in creating opportunities for others to do the same.

This special session introduces and develops a new area of sociological research that interrogates climate change as a social problem. The session focuses on theoretical and empirical research investigating the relationships between human and social dynamics, institutions, and systems, and the causes and consequences of climate change in the Anthropocene epoch. The session focuses on micro-, meso-, and macro-level approaches to the study of climate change including attitudes, emotions and perceptions related to climate change, how intersectional dimensions of identity and collectivity condition unequal treatment/outcomes, local and state interventions in comparative perspective, and social movements and environmental justice efforts aimed at reducing, mitigating, or adapting to the effects of climate change.

As we commemorate the 50th anniversary of the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., we evaluate the use of nonviolence to facilitate social change and a means for social movements. Although the use of nonviolent strategies and tactics has many sources, the US civil rights movement - drawing directly upon Mohandas K. Gandhi's use of nonviolent civil resistance in the Indian Freedom Movement and its systematization by sociologists like Gene Sharp and countless practitioners. The scholarship and praxis regarding nonviolence has increased dramatically and matured considerably in the past 50 years, including empirical studies that explore it qualitatively and quantitatively. This session explores the relevance of nonviolence for 21st century social change movements and its multiple dimensions; how has our understanding of nonviolence changed and, as Dr. King asked, "Where do we go from here?"

College Students' Cross-Class Friendships: A Social Network and Interactional Approach Janice McCabe, Dartmouth College

Social class inequality has skyrocketed over the past thirty years and shows little sign of abating in the near future. With political solutions to inequality looking unlikely, one other potential solution emerges: the ability for people to help each other across class lines. The difficulties of this approach are also enormous, as the classes are geographically and socially segregated. This panel looks at what we can learn about individuals' ability to form cross-class relationships and what potential these relationships hold for addressing inequality. We focus both on successful cross-class interactions -- ones with the potential to alleviate inequality -- and on how to avoid unsuccessful cross-class interactions.

Native Nations and Indigenous Peoples in the Americas experience the full range of emotional relations, ranging from surviving genocide to tribal nation recognition, over the last 240 years, and 500 years of colonization. All Indigenous Scholars relate these experiences to U.S. policy constructs, nationhood, contemporary movements, Indigenous Canada and Mexico, identity, invisibility and dominant oppression. ASA 2018 in Philadelphia meets where a Constitutional Convention formed a new country where American Indians were excluded from participation as citizens or full nations, as fought over treaties until 1871, citizenship 1924, Indian reservations 20th century, sovereignty and contested identity through the 21st century movement at Standing Rock as Nations in resistance to ongoing dominance, neoliberalism, natural resource extraction, and racism, that make Indigenous people feel like we are Aliens on our own lands.

Invoking an old racial and colonial trope to delegitimize critiques against his administration's response to Hurricane Maria, U.S. President Trump publicly depicted Puerto Ricans as lazy and unwilling to work for their own recovery. But this is far from the truth. Without sufficient aid, individuals, families, organizations, and communities on the island pooled resources, cleared roads, distributed supplies, and sought help for the sick and elderly. These efforts were aided by extensive fundraising and support from the Puerto Rican diaspora. Although Puerto Rico remains in a crisis situation, emergent initiatives and projects have begun to envision and enact ideas to rebuild and remake Puerto Rico. These responses, operating at different scales of social life and organization, raise complex questions about the politics and economies of reconstruction and decolonization. This panel, composed of scholars and activists, reflects on these questions and the future of Puerto Rico.

Philadelphia's history and livelihood is incomplete without an understanding of how ordinary people, despite the city's repeated attempts to exclude and marginalize their existence, have organized themselves to resist structural oppression. The invitation to explore "feeling race" comes with a great responsibility to lift up Philly's distinct approach to challenging and organizing against the existing racial order. Traditionally marginalized groups in Philadelphia have consistently created and cultivated resistance through a framework of arts, representation and culture simply because these mediums more holistically embody the reality and nature of their racialized emotions. Using DuBois, Lefebvre and Bourdieu's frameworks around the intersections of art, politics, power and the right to the city movements, we highlight Philly's distinct forms of community-based cultural resistance as a vehicle for societal transformation. Despite the layers of collective trauma and harm woven into Philly's most marginalized communities and neighborhoods, the city's legacy of organizing persists through the cultivation of artistic and healing spaces.

The Hazards of Not Being Seen: how Inequalities of Race and Disability that Render Students Invisible make Communication Impossible Derek C. Coates, University of California-Berkeley

The session will focus on documenting narratives and practices related to unconscious racism that has been institutionalized in interracial interactions between minority and majority populations. A small group of interactionists within the Ethnomethodology Section have pursued this research focus on Interaction Orders of Race over the past 25 years. The papers will identify, document, and describe tacit practices that people use to handle the emotions involved in responding to racism and hyper-surveillance in everyday life. Equally, the papers will examine the tacit unconscious interactional labor involved in producing racial inequality. The focus will be on interracial settings in which clashing Interaction Order Expectations create and maintain racial inequality. The papers will examine how multiple and contradictory interactional demands on racial identity create persistent problems in social situations that involve race; problems that require a great deal of emotional labor to navigate no matter what interactional strategies are used to alleviate them. This emotional labor is documented in the tacit practices that are demanded of both minority and majority participants. This can make interracial interaction exhausting and dangerous, and places daunting limitations upon the human relations and communication that can be achieved. The misunderstandings generated by clashing interaction orders can be a matter of life and death for many people of color. Topics include policing, immigration, Arab identity formation and mass incarceration.

4273. Special Session. The Fight for Fair Housing: Causes, Consequences, and Future Implications of the 1968 Federal Fair Housing Act
Philadelphia Marriott Downtown, Franklin Hall 9, Level 4, 10:30am-12:10pm

Panelists: Douglas S. Massey, Princeton University
Thomas J. Sugrue, New York University

Lisa Rice, National Fair Housing Alliance
Paul A. Jargowsky, University of Texas-Dallas

The Federal Fair Housing Act of 1968 was passed at a time of turmoil, conflict, and conflagration in cities across the nation. The Act had a dual mandate: ending discrimination and dismantling the segregated living patterns characterizing most cities. The Fight for Fair Housing, edited by Gregory D. Squires (George Washington University) and published in 2018, commemorates the 50th anniversary of this law and tells what happened, why, and what remains to be done. The book brings together the nation's leading fair housing activists and scholars to tell the stories that led to passage of the Fair Housing Act, its consequences, and the implications of the Act going forward. This session will bring together four contributors to this volume to recount and update their stories. Squires will provide an overview of evolving patterns of discrimination and segregation, and the politics framing past, present, and future fair housing scholarship and activism. Thomas Sugrue (New York University) will survey the public policies and private practices that generated the activism leading to the 1968 law. Douglas S. Massey will examine the intersection of race and class focusing on the role of zoning in creating and perpetuating segregation. Lisa Rice (National Fair Housing Alliance) will describe the dual housing finance market that has provided a critical structural underpinning of segregation. Paul Jargowsky (Rutgers University) will serve as a discussant and provide recommendations for future research and policy.

No Muslims Under My Roof: Religious and Ethnic Discrimination in the Sharing Economy Grace Yukich, Quinnipiac University

The recent expansion of the sharing economy, particularly for-profit platforms such as short-term housing rentals (Airbnb), ride sharing (Uber, Lyft), and the sale of labor (Taskrabbit), has been met with a mix of enthusiasm and concern. The sharing economy highlights and exacerbates many of the long-term trends towards casualization of labor and skyrocketing economic inequality. Increasingly, it is becoming clear that the sharing economy can exacerbate racial inequalities, and that racial bias operates in the sharing economy and can even be facilitated by its platforms. For example, researchers are finding that Taskrabbit workers and Uber drivers are vulnerable to being pulled into illegal or jeopardizing activities and financial scams by those who hire them. The availability of new nationwide data on Airbnb listings has yielded findings that hosts of color, and especially African-American hosts, are rated lower, receive fewer listings and earn less than white hosts. Fingerprint screening of minority drivers for ride share companies in the era of mass incarceration raises questions about social justice. At the same time, these companies use narratives of battling racial segregation, serving underserved neighborhoods, and providing jobs to racial minorities – all to market their services and build brands. The papers in this session will present recent research findings on race in the sharing economy, pushing the study of this rapidly growing sector to connect with the study of race, racism, and racial inequality.

Session Organizer: Mary Chayko, Rutgers University

Leader: Mary Chayko, Rutgers University

Panelists: Julie B. Wiest, West Chester University of Pennsylvania

Myron T. Strong, Community College of Baltimore County

Paul Calarco, Hudson Valley Community College

Social media is becoming an important and in many ways indispensable platform for teaching, learning, and researching; networking and connecting with other academics and the general public; and driving traffic to your work. In this workshop, four sociologists with expertise in using social media and blogging for these purposes provide how-to tips to help other academics start or develop their profiles and networks. Panelists and participants will also discuss the benefits and hazards, advantages and disadvantages, of developing an academic presence on social media.

PSID is a data source used by sociologists in a variety of specialty areas, including stratification and mobility, family, children and youth, aging, and education. Because of the study's duration and complex design, the publicly available data can feel overwhelming to a new user. The proposed session provides a helpful and efficient orientation to the study's many components.

Racial inequality in America is a complex, interlocking system of social categories. Activists have long sought to challenge and transform this system through protest. This panel draws together some of sociology's leading scholars of protest, race, and ethnicity to lead a discussion about race-based mobilization in the American context. This panel starts from the assumption that racial and ethnic groups in America face very different circumstances and that struggles against inequality reflect distinct historical trajectories. The panelists have investigated African-American civil rights protest, Asian-American panethnicity, and immigrant and Latino mobilization. Their research has explored "classic protest" such as Civil Rights era boycott movements, lesser known protest such Black Power activism in the professions, and contemporary youth-led protest in California. Not only will this panel address the diversity of race-based activism in the United States, it will approach the topic from multiple theoretical and empirical perspectives. This panel presents a unique opportunity to reflect on an exciting nexus in sociological research.

Neuro-intervention or Neuro-voyeurism? The Corporeal Politics of the Brain, Race, and Racism

The material structures and behavioral correlates of brains are an important site for racialization. Researchers conceptualize the structure and function of people's brains, including the dynamics and distribution of mental illness and affect, social inequalities in intelligence and cognition, and group responsiveness to psychotropic drugs, in explicitly racial and ethnic terms. Within the rise of neuroscience and the reconfiguration of psychiatry as an increasingly biological science, race has been a scientifically useful and economically profitable category for thinking about categorical differences between brains, rather than as a way to think about how unequal social conditions, linked to racial classifications, create differences between brains. Relatedly, brains have become principal sites for biosocial interventions that aim to remedy structural conditions created by institutionalized racism and social inequality. How, then, are race and ethnicity taken up and transformed through historical and contemporary scientific practices that aim to understand and act on brains? This session presents papers that broadly examine the embodiment of race and ethnicity in scientific knowledge and material practices across mental health domains including neuroscience, biopsychiatry, and psychopharmacology.

4318. Teaching Workshop. Guarding Against Burnout: A Structural Interpretation of the Syllabus
Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 12:30-2:10pm

Session Organizer: Stefanie Celeste Wellons, Aiken Technical College

Leader: Stefanie Celeste Wellons, Aiken Technical College

Although teaching is a profession that is highly vulnerable to burnout, a structural interpretation of racism suggests that teachers of color (ToC) may be especially susceptible. Because race is structural (Bonilla-Silva 1997), this suggests that teachers perform in a broader context of race that independently ranks their positions and, in turn, organizes their relations. Because teachers are inextricably linked to their institutional and classroom contexts, I provide a holistic approach that acknowledges and purposefully addresses the inseparable relationship between teachers and their broader context. Thus, this workshop is structurally designed to afford actively engaged activities that promote reflection and self-awareness. Following the teacher renewal approach (Intrator and Kunzman 2006), I will integrate poetry, stories, and art to cultivate a safe and secure workshop environment particularly for teachers who may be apprehensive about openly sharing personal experiences. Also, crucial to this activity is promoting self-reflective silence in which teachers can envision how they see their students leaving their course. To further engross teachers in this activity, they will be asked to draw a vivid picture that illustrates their course vision. Once complete, teachers will establish and align course goals to their course vision. To construct a course that is also relevant to students, I will provide a short questionnaire that gauges students' interest in the course that is intended for distribution on the first day of class. Designing a mutually relevant syllabus encourages student engagement at the onset of courses that can be reinforced throughout the semester by incorporating formative and summative assessments that are aligned to students' self-reported needs. Cultivating a classroom community creates and reinforces a symbolic barrier against cynical social forces internal and external to the classroom, while also preserving teachers' excitement and dedication to students.

The United States has the capacity to be a world leader in global solutions to climate change, namely the global reduction of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions. However, it has largely abdicated that potential. This panel explores some of the sociological aspects of that failure rooted in the popular feeling-structure or emotional culture of climate change as it differs by racial, ethnic and gender categories.

Stories about the Past through the Lens of the Present: Second Generation Refugees Making Sense of their Parent's Exile Alice Bloch, University of Manchester
Discussant: John Solomos, University of Warwick

This special session focuses on the experiences of refugees as they navigate different stages of the process – from flight and borders, to resettlement and to second generation growing up within the context of refugee families. The current global context of increased border controls and securitization, greater insecurities and exclusions and targeted and racialised hostility towards refugees and asylum seekers makes this panel topical and significant. This session will expand our scope of understanding by moving away from policy and politics and instead focusing on the lived experiences of those subjected to contemporary regimes and at different stages of the refugee and asylum process, within different geographical contexts through the lens of family, feelings and emotions. Three speakers will discuss the cases of Great Britain, the United States and a comparative analysis of Canada, United States, and Mexico. The discussant will address the three papers and include some wider reflections on the need to place race and racism more centrally within any analysis of forced displacement.

The election of Donald Trump, the widening wealth gap, continued abuses of human rights home and abroad, and the steady and unyielding barrage of nativism, racism, sexism, and xenophobia, all seems held together by a dialectic of responses: from unbridled emotion in the form of rants, screams, and shouts into the abyss on the one end, to organized and structured collective activism on the other end. Yet, rarely are these two discussed as complimentary to, or as catalysts for, one another. Rather, emotion is often seen, at the worst, as the enemy of a cool, "rational," and thus effective activist praxis or, at the best, as the fire in the engine of an ordered protest. The scholars on this panel deconstruct this binary and emphasize how emotions (like rage and anger) often seen as deleterious to progress, social change, and even science, have a place.

Racialized Citizenship among Asian and Latina Immigrant Activists and What it Means for Intersectionality, Borders, the Body, and Emotions Nadia Y. Kim, Loyola Marymount University

This session will address how race, racialization, and racism pivot not just on color and class injustices specific to Black Americans but on nativist injustices suffered by indigenous, Asian Pacific Islander, Latinx, and Middle Eastern Americans, albeit in related and distinct ways (e.g., the panel will address the "foreignizing" of Obama that drew on such racializations). Although sociology has given a nod to such nativistic racism, mostly toward the Latinx population, its core theories, frameworks, models, and concepts have not centered, nor extended from, "the citizenship line." This line draws boundaries between "us Americans" and the bestial savage, brown brother, labor threat, business threat, academic threat, terrorist, war-time enemy, exotic seductress, anchor-baby maker, or maternity tourist. As this list of representations reveal, we also make gender central to our reconceptualization of race and citizenship in our studies of US settler colonialism, Asian Pacific American (APA) motherhood, the deportation of Latinx and other immigrants of color, and of Latinx and APA immigrant activism for Environmental Justice. That is, any time that sociologists allow the varied types of "racialized foreigners within" to consume our theories and analyses, we center gender, class, economics, nation, transnationality, (neo)imperialism, neoliberalism, the body, and emotions. By making statements about emotions with respect to racialized citizenship, not only are we engaging the conference theme, but we are addressing different and underappreciated angles that we believe to reflect more accurately our pre- and post-Trump social world.

In recent years, high profile incidents of police shootings in minority communities, which disproportionately affect Black Americans, have drawn more attention to the racialized aspect of law enforcement. While much scholarly research has focused on the impact of policing in black communities, less is known about how the intersection between immigration and law enforcement affects Latinx people and other ethnoracial groups. Given the diversity of the Latinx community, the combination of minority and immigrant status magnifies issues of health and well-being for this group, making them particularly vulnerable to health disparities. Moreover, because much research has shown that racism and discrimination can negatively affect the health outcomes of Blacks and Latinos, it is likely that racialized profiling, policing, and immigration enforcement can also influence the physical and mental health of these populations. Yet, less research has actually explored the relationship between race, immigration, policing, and health, particularly research has yet to ascertain how empathy on the part of law enforcement and the public is racialized, differentially affecting immigrants' and minorities' encounters with law enforcement relative to white citizens'. Throughout history and the present, white citizens have been given the benefit of the doubt and less severe punishments for being accused of or committing the same crimes that minority populations have. Thus, the different ways in which empathy is racialized may also perpetuate and exacerbate existing physical and mental health disparities. Therefore, this panel will bring together a group of race, immigration, and health scholars whose research draws on an array of methodological techniques to examine how racialized empathy through differential policing may contribute to existing health disparities. Specifically, the panelists investigate the role of law and immigration enforcement (i.e. deportations) in affecting the physical and mental well-being of communities of color around the United States.
