In this session we seek to move beyond the simple ideology that's been proposed as part of the 'cool pose' thesis. Instead, our panel of urban ethnographers will consider some of the emotions, vulnerabilities, and other feelings experienced and shared among their participants that were not always obvious. Although ethnographies are often overlooked as studies in the sociology of emotions, these efforts show us that the men involved were indeed emotional. Our panel will share some of their insight on the vulnerabilities hidden among inner city men.

In the Spring 2016 issue of Sociology of Race and Ethnicity, Eduardo Bonilla-Silva challenged sociologists of race and ethnicity to "feel race". He challenged us to do so not only by incorporating the emotional dimensions of race and racism into our sociological theorization and analyses, but also by speaking plainly and unapologetically about the emotional weight of existing as a racial subject in a predominantly white society. In the words of W.E.B. Du Bois: "How does it feel to be a problem?" Indeed, race is always already laden with emotion. However, this very real dimension of the social rarely enters into mainstream sociological research or debate. This Presidential Session invites a panel of leading comparative-historical sociologists' of race, ethnicity and indigeneity to reflect on the interconnections, challenges, and possibilities that "feeling race" presents to comparative-historical sociological research and to the discipline writ large.

This session will address the emotion of anxiety, framed around prospects for racial/ethnic demographic change in American society. Over the past several decades, the U.S. population has transformed from a primarily White, non-Hispanic population to one filled with myriad groups from all across the globe, and a population where Blacks, Hispanics, Asians, American Indians, Pacific Islanders, and Multiracial groups collectively outnumber Whites in many cities, counties, and a growing number of states. Researchers will discuss these demographic changes and how their work has been received by the public, focusing on the emotion of anxiety as it relates to these potential changes in the makeup of our country's diversity - whether it be in the present, 10 years from now, or in 2050. Demographic methods for projecting racial/ethnic diversity do not operate in a vacuum and their resulting impact on media reports of demographic change have led to emotions of feeling anxiety or feeling empowered. Themes such as "the Declining White Majority" and "the Rise of Diversity" represent some of the ways in which the projected trends of the racial/ethnic composition of the United States population impacts the way that people feel about their prospects for the future.

Over the past many years, sociologists have thought long and hard over how to do public sociology. Still, most of us, irrespective of the quality of our work or possible broader importance, are pretty irrelevant beyond our small-ish scholarly circuits. Our research, earth shattering though it may be, is like that tree falling in the forest. We think, we research, and we write, but few notice. (SAD!) The panelists here -- former editors and current senior managing editor of Contexts, a journalist, a photographer, and a poet (sociologists all) -- will discuss different ways they do their thing to find and communicate with that unicorn we're all looking for -- the informed, general public audience.

In an era of persistent, inflamed tensions around race, class, immigration, and citizenship, sociologists face growing calls to confront issues of oppression and social justice directly. ASA leaders have made steps toward a more engaged sociology – from Michael Burawoy’s 2005 call for public sociology to the recent formation of the Sociology Action Network.

Researchers, community members, and activists who conduct collaborative, community engaged scholarship (CCES) offer a compelling answer to this call by partnering to create knowledge in direct support of equity-oriented change agendas. This kind of scholarship challenges the hierarchy of expertise and the hegemony of academic knowledge, recognizing that communities have a need for and indeed a “right” to research, collaborate, and organize efforts to build power for change. Unfortunately, while calls for more engagement emerge periodically, mainstream sociology creates numerous incentives that undermine the vitality and feasibility of such work. In this session, we draw on the experience and work of scholars of the Urban Research Based Action Network (URBAN) Scholars – a coalition of 1,800+ scholars, activists, and artists committed to social change, and democratizing knowledge production. This session covers how to create institutional infrastructures that support this kind of scholarship and support the scholars who pursue it, as this work challenges entrenched inequality and oppression. URBAN will work with ASA Sections to empower administrators, graduate apprentices, and credentialed scholars to pursue and promote acceptance and visibility of this model of accountability and collaboration in research, activism, mentoring and apprenticeship, in academic institutions and among peers.

1174. Section on Sociology of Religion. Religion, Gender, and Sexuality

From the social media and advertising platform Facebook’s “reactions” button that lets users express how they feel, like “Sad”, “Angry” and “Haha”, to the U.S. Department of Homeland Security’s Eye on Awareness™ anti-terrorism program that tasks front desk staff, housekeeping attendants and other hotel workers with detecting terrorist behaviors and suspicious guests by trusting their gut feelings and saying something if they see something, emotions continue to be a ways and means of surveillance. The idea that emotion analytic software and other affective computing technologies are put to use for racial profiling – like targeted advertising or denial of services, the analytics firm Geofeedia’s tracking of activists of color by monitoring emojis on social media, and facial recognition technology that is said to read travellers’ emotions at airports and public spaces and then assign threat categories – requires that we center race and its various intersections when it comes to our analyses of surveillance. This panel seeks to do just this by historicizing surveillance, discussing infrastructure, analyzing how surveillance is felt by those who are subject to it, and examining the role of resistance.

In recent months, we have witnessed the issue of sexual violence shift from silence to national discourse. From the election of sexual predator to US president, to the outing of multiple harassers and rapists in Hollywood, and thousands of survivors sharing their stories online via the #MeToo social media hashtag, attention to sexual violence has increased and demands for ending it have grown louder. Academia, like every other social institution, is not immune from the pervasiveness of sexual harassment, sexual assault, rape, and stalking. This workshop brings together survivors, experts, and activists to achieve two goals. First panelists will discuss ways to effectively prevent sexual violence and support survivors of such violence in multiple contexts in sociology, including classrooms, departments, conferences, research abroad, and online. Second, panelists will speak to the ways that we might use sociology to support broader movements to end sexual violence around the nation.

The sociology of race and ethnicity has paid much attention to the negative effects of processes of racialization on individuals and communities across a range of social, economic and political outcomes. Scholars have also done important work on how racialization, and racism specifically, negatively affects identity, self-esteem, social relations and the possibilities of building inclusive communities across racial divides. Nevertheless, less attention has been paid to the ways in which individuals and groups construct counter-narratives about themselves and their communities, or how they foster racial consciousness and solidarity across groups. Indeed, as they navigate societies based on racial meanings and hierarchies, they also find ways to construct ideas of themselves and build social relationships that are not based exclusively on negation and domination. In this thematic panel we analyze the understudied positive emotions related to race and racial identity. More specifically, we focus on how race has been a source of solidarity, affinity and belonging for people. In it, we analyze how these positive emotions associated with race play out in various spaces from the politics of neighborhood and space to institutions to social movements. In analyzing these questions, we decenter black-white relations as the primary node for understanding race, identity and emotions. We also pay special attention to the ways in which race intersects with other axes of power and domination, including gender and sexuality, in ways that both create opportunities and challenges for “feeling race” in positive and transformative ways.

This session will showcase new methods in the study of emotions. Scholars will present technologies such as functional magnetic resonance imaging, infrared thermography, electroencephalography, and sentiment analysis to show how they can capture emotions in a more refined way, thereby detecting what ordinarily may have been missed. Such methodological advances will improve our theories about emotions and develop our understanding of emotions in everyday life.

“I have firmly believed all along that the law was on our side and would, when we appealed to it, give us justice. I feel shown of that belief and utterly discouraged, and just now, if it were possible, would gather my race in my arms and fly away with them.” —Ida B. Wells Memphis Diary
Ida B. Wells-Barnett, the famed journalist, suffragist, sociologist, and Black feminist, wrote these words into her personal diary in the midst of a nadir moment in Black history, in which relentless racial terrorism— particularly lynching— was the weapon of choice for a widespread white backlash to the Reconstruction’s

Black progress just a generation prior. In her diary, Wells creates an intimate space in which her long and tiring struggle for justice is laid bare in the confessional of her private writing. This haunting and yet reassuring language brings us insight into not only the emotional toil that liberation movements take on activists, but also into the emotional practices of our activist foremothers throughout some of our history's darkest days. This panel seeks to lay bare, critique, and strategize the emotional labor, rewards, and costs that contemporary scholars/activists have encountered at the dawn of another possible nadir in our history where we are witnessing the re-normalization of White nationalism. By placing panelists and audience members in conversation, this panel hope to draw attention to experiences and first-hand accounts of the emotional work of activism, as well as provide some evidence-based research about the role of emotions, emotional health, and the personal in social justice movements. This panel particularly focuses on the role of socially and politically marginalized peoples and women/femmes in this work.

1218. Teaching Workshop. Partnering with Community Organizations to Develop Culturally Relevant, Place-based Learning Experiences

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 10:30am-12:10pm

Session Organizer: Latasha Sarpy, Bunker Hill Community College

BHCC has earned a national reputation for creating successful learning environments for its diverse student body. In this workshop participants will learn about a replicable model for partnering with community organizations to develop culturally relevant, place-based learning experiences. Participants will benefit from the College's experience building Cultural Institutes in African American, Asian American, and Latino Studies. The proposed workshop will engage participants in the following dynamic learning activities: 1) Think-Pair-Share of the defining features of culturally relevant practice; 2) Jigsaw Activity that draws upon Visual Thinking Strategies (VTS) to engage participants in the scholarship and practice of culturally relevant, place-based learning; 3) Discussion of how the Cultural Institute model might be adapted to their local context; and 4) Brainstorm of challenges to implementing this approach on their campuses and strategies for addressing these challenges. Among the lessons learned are that culturally relevant practice is rooted in a growth mindset and firm belief in the capacity of all students to succeed; faculty and staff need ample time for critical reflection during and after Cultural Institutes in order to process what they are learning and integrate it into their practice; curricular integration is an iterative process, with more depth and expertise achieved over time; and building authentic, reciprocal relationships with community partners is an essential component of this work.

The Task Force on Engaging Sociology is proposing to sponsor this and other workshops that focus on illuminating best practices, key strategies, and innovative techniques for engaging new publics in sociological dialogues. Our discipline has much to say about many of the most controversial topics on Twitter: race, immigration policy, gender inequality, sports, and the rise of Trumpism. Many of these topics touch on the 2018 theme of "Feeling Race" and the workshop leader is committed to featuring panelists who don't shy away from such controversies, but choose instead to engage them in the digital realm. This panel will be of interest to any ASA member seeking to increase the knowledge of Twitter and how to use it to make an impact in the public sphere

The Trump administration promises broad expansion of gun rights in the U.S. As candidates, Trump-Pence ran with the full endorsement of the NRA and vowed to end gun-free zones in schools and airports, severely curtail gun-violence prevention efforts, and make it ever-easier for people to carry guns across state lines and into cities such as New York. These promises have already begun to come to fruition, with many more soon to come. This panel combines journalists, activists, legislators, and academics to discuss gun policy and its everyday effects under the most overtly pro-gun administration in modern memory. It will address questions such as: *What are the implications for gun-violence-prevention policy, legislation, reporting, and research? *What are the implications of gun proliferation for communities of color? *What role will the NRA play in shaping public policy? *What impact might legislation such as concealed-carry reciprocity have for policing? *What new strategies are needed to promote balance between gun rights and public safety, or foster conversations between disparate people, groups, and factions along the oft-contentious U.S. gun debate?

Stuart Hall (1932-2014), formerly Professor of Sociology at the Open University from 1979-1997, was a preeminent black public intellectual and pioneer in the field of Cultural Studies. Through an astonishing volume of writings, lectures, and speeches, Hall helped to deepen sociological understandings of culture, rethought the limitations and possibilities of Marxist theory, identified the key ideological components of neoliberalism, contributed significantly to the analytics of race, identity and subjectivity, and brought questions concerning diaspora and hybridity into discussion with issues of nationalism, globalization and theories of the State. While it is difficult to summarize the breadth of Hall's intellectual thought, it is undeniably the case that his scholarship influenced many disciplines and fields of study across both the social sciences and humanities. Somewhat remarkably, the American Sociological Association is yet to mark Stuart Hall's unique contributions to sociology or to adequately acknowledge the importance of Hall's "conjunctural" sociological project to U.S. sociology. This panel brings together leading sociologists with expertise in a range of areas, including race and media, postcolonial theory, migration studies, visual sociology, and gender and sexuality studies, to reflect on Stuart Hall's enduring legacy, to consider the ways his work has (re)vitalized aspects of U.S. sociology, as well as to address how key areas of sociological inquiry stand to benefit by engaging his prolific and generative body of thought.

This workshop brings together a group of sociology professors to discuss best practices in addressing issues of social inequality and social justice in the sociology classroom, particularly in our current socio-historical context. We will share our teaching experiences, and encourage conversations between presenters and participants on successes and challenges of incorporating students' identity and life experiences into our sociology courses. Successful teaching often requires that students connect sociological concepts and theories to their life experiences, while developing empathy for experiences beyond their own. How can we best address these dynamics in ways that encourage a diversity of voices in the service of engaging with course materials and cultivating the sociological imagination? We will discuss strategies for applying these ideas, as well as the personal and professional risks, that may arise in doing so. We hope to encourage critical discussion of how issues of social inequality and social justice are reflected back in our classrooms. We will contribute ideas about curricular and pedagogical practices that facilitate the examination of how positionality, privilege, and inequality shape our sociology courses.

1410. Teaching Workshop. Stimulating the Sociological Imagination in the Required Theory and Research Methods Courses

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 104B, Level 100, 2:30-4:10pm

Session Organizer: Anne Frances Eisenberg, State University of New York-Geneseo

Co-Leader: Michael Restivo, State University of New York-Geneseo

Both students and faculty alike tend to dread the required courses found in every undergraduate curriculum – theory and research methods. We, however, see these courses as the heart of the sociological endeavor and use a variety of teaching techniques and tools to actively engage students in the topic matter itself as well as to hone the critical skills associated with their sociological imagination. We feel that these two courses can spark students' sociological imagination as much as the substantive courses they take. This workshop will present the framework and materials used in a research methods course and a classical theory course. Additionally – this hands-on workshop will give participants an opportunity to identify key components of a framework for their own classes. We will, also, provide a set of materials that highlight the process of developing these courses as well as sample assignments and syllabi that have proven successful. Both presenters link the abstract ideas associated with these courses to exploring contemporary social issues dealing with race, class and gender thus directly relating to the Annual Meeting theme.

Shytierra Gaston, Indiana University-Bloomington

Discussant: Devon Johnson, George Mason University

Since the 2014 officer-involved shooting death of Michael Brown, a black 18-year old in Ferguson, Missouri, a spate of police killings of unarmed black men, women, and children has been heavily publicized, bringing nationwide and even international attention to the longstanding issue of racialized state-sanctioned violence in the U.S., in particular, police brutality. In this session, we explore the feeling of race in the administration of police violence, perceptions of police violence, and social responses to police violence. A panel of scholars will present findings from their research centered on community members and law enforcement in the post-Ferguson era.

1416. Thematic Session. Race, Color, Caste, and Blood in Global Perspective

Color, Race, and Ethnicity in Latin America
Edward E. Telles, University of California-Santa Barbara

This session aims to expand the scope of understanding of race beyond the United States and explore the similarities and differences of the ways in which marginalized groups in different regions of the world are racialized with metaphors and discourses associated with skin color, caste and/or blood, and the ways in which people talk about these with their "feelings" not only through the vision but also through other senses. Four speakers will discuss the cases of Europe, India, and Japan and Latin America, generally having the United States as a contrast.

1418. Professional Development Workshop. Getting a Book Published (Sponsored by the Public Engagement Advisory Committee)

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 2:30-4:10pm

Session Organizer: Allison Pugh, University of Virginia

Leader: Allison Pugh, University of Virginia

Panelists: Naomi Schneider, University of California Press
James Cook, Oxford University Press

Ilene Kalish, New York University Press

Particularly for qualitative researchers, books are a major pathway for sharing the results of their work with the discipline. Yet, many younger scholars (particularly at institutions with a teaching mission) it is most unclear how they should go about the process of publishing a book. This workshop will provide invaluable information for many scholars, particularly younger scholars, for them to draw on as they navigate the process of book publishing.

Representations of Ghetto Life in Contemporary Hollywood

Film John L. Jackson, University of Pennsylvania

What can the social sciences add to ongoing discussions/debates about how Hollywood renders our social world, especially in terms of its representations of differences linked to race, class, ethnicity, gender, sexuality, nationality, and religion (among other charged and politicized categories of social difference often dramatized on screen)? Movements such as #OscarsSoWhite and calls for boycotts against Hollywood because of its lack of racial diversity on screen and in annual celebrations of its (self-designated) "best motion pictures" help to highlight the controversies around identity politics that animate our public sphere. This panel will ask a diverse group of prominent sociologists and other social scientists to provide analyses of how contemporary cinematic offerings might be mined for insights into 21st century social life. Whether re-reading representations of Bruce Lee films for their complicatedly "Orientalist" constructions, analyzing Hollywood's big-budget interpretations of classic sociological claims, or unpacking variously sexualized portraits of subaltern difference in urban America, Hollywood film serves as a potentially powerful reflection of key issues/themes that showcase the vibrancy, urgency, and relevance of sociological research. Panelists will demonstrate some of what can be gained from unleashing the sociological imagination on Hollywood's image industry.

What Academe Gets Right and Wrong About the "Social Construction of Race": Recent Case Studies in the Epistemology of Ignorance Matthew W. Hughey, University of Connecticut

The ways in which academic scholars conceive of and debate matters of race and racism are matters of theoretical discussion, but they are also practical matters in contemporary societies. Debates about the relationship of scholarship to politics are not new but they signify in particular ways in our times when addressing questions about racism, xenophobia, and racial inequality in the everyday social and political realities of contemporary societies is at a heightened level. Forced migration, refugees, and race in Europe, alongside public furore about police brutality in the USA have spilled over into campaigns such as Open Borders, Cities/universities of sanctuary, and made Black Lives Matter into a mainstream political question. Alongside all of this the academy itself has been brought into the spotlight through campaigns such as Rhodes Must Fall and Why isn't my professor black, while post-colonial and decolonial scholars have also raised far reaching questions about the racialised history and precepts of our discipline. This wide range raises numerous questions about the nature and purpose of academic labour. The main aim of this session is however to try to 'reverse the gaze' - to centre the university and scholars as the object of scrutiny. It seeks to explore what scholars can learn and apply from a range of public engagements and what this entails in terms of feeding back into research and teaching. The speakers will discuss their own work and engagements and how this has fed back into and played out in institutional settings

Trump campaign on building wall to keep Mexicans out and called these immigrants murders and rapists. This campaign theme followed the Obama administration that deported more immigrants than previous presidents over the last few decades. During this time the funnel effect of border security has pushed immigrants into crossing the most desolate portions of the desert. Immigration law enforcement was once considered a Southwestern phenomenon but since the push for deportations, policing citizenship status is more widely practiced with various degrees of civil and human rights violations. This increase has been fueled at the local level through 287g Agreements to local police departments. This panel presents research on the face of immigration law enforcement present in the country.

We live in a moment of unprecedented reflexivity. As cultural understandings of race, gender and sexuality evolve, our categories themselves seem transferable and negotiable in novel ways. Some posit these changes as the erosion of long-held categorical systems; others see them as signposts of new, but equally entrenched racial and sexual orders. How are sociologists considering and trying to make sense of the fluidity of identities in the modern world? What new or emerging tools do we bring to identities, categories and self-understandings? Panelists will discuss their work on race, gender and sexuality, with an eye toward capturing the distinctive contribution of sociology to our understandings of contemporary difference.

1509. Teaching Workshop. How Sociologists can Inform and Engage Citizens through Wikipedia
Pennsylvania Convention Center, 104A, Level 100, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: Jami Mathewson, Wiki Education
Leader: Michael Eddie Ramirez, Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi

With the sheer volume of information now available on the internet, having trustworthy, accurate digital resources is more important than ever. The general public no longer only turns to publishers, subject matter experts, or even news outlets for most of our information; they also look to Wikipedia. Wikipedia is edited by volunteers, with varying interests, educational contexts, and access to academic publications. The site still lacks detailed and accurate articles about scientific topics relevant to informed citizens, and sociology content and sociological perspectives are often inaccurate, misrepresented, or missing altogether. That's why Wiki Education, a nonprofit organization dedicated to improving Wikipedia's quality, equity, and reach, has partnered with the American Sociological Association. We invite members and sociology experts to amplify the impact of their research by joining one of Wiki Education's programs dedicated to adding reliable, accessible sociology information to the free encyclopedia. Sociologists may participate by assigning students to edit Wikipedia's sociology content, learning how to contribute to Wikipedia themselves, or providing Wikipedia volunteers with remote access to sociology scholarship. At this workshop, we will discuss sociology content gaps on Wikipedia, and we will encourage attendees to join our initiative to close these gaps and make information more accessible and comprehensible to the public. Program participants and Wiki Education staff will share: outcomes of the initiative thus far; learning benefits for students and scholars; and details about Wiki Education's suite of tools, trainings, and Wikipedia expertise available to program participants.

Feeling Disconnected: Latina Lesbian-Queer CisWomen and the Intersectional Structuring of Legitimacy and

Community Marysol Asencio, University of Connecticut

Within sociology, studies on the lives of queer women of color are still few in number. The existing research is significantly limited across various social domains and the diversity of the population (both nationally and internationally). Yet, the inclusion of this research in sociological inquiry can significantly broaden our understanding of the existing interlocking social inequalities, structural barriers, taken-for-granted social and institutional assumptions and social relationships. While intersectionality was introduced to better understand and situate the experiences of populations with multiple markers and sites of social oppressions, in particular women of color, it has also been evolving in both its theorization and application. Panelists will present research on queer women of color which explores issues of subjectivity and emotion in their negotiations of macro- and micro-level limitation and opportunities imposed by race, gender, race, class, age, sexuality, religion, citizenship and other pertinent social markers. Panelists will also engage with how their positionality and approaches to intersectionality may advance a distinct queer woman of color analysis. Through presentations and discussions among panelists and participants, this session will examine the state of research on queer women of color, the usefulness of an intersectional approach, and the significance of emotions to expanding this field of research.

1514. Thematic Session. Race, Technology and 21st Century Inequality

Branding, Beauty, and the Changing Face of Retail Work Joya Misra, University of Massachusetts-Amherst; Kyla Walters, University of Massachusetts-Amherst

This session examines the diminution of retail occupations in the American labor market by asking: Where are women and men of color occupationally located within the labor market respect to retail occupations?; What are the successes and/or challenges for these employees as employment conditions move in the direction of job shrinkage and depletion?; When does possession of retail skill level readiness become salient in the current and future labor market for new work responsibilities? Thus, the session examines these issues with an eye toward understanding how workplace changes are influencing employment statistics. For example, what are their numbers in retail occupations?; What parts of the country are these employees located?; or are they located in major cities only?

1518. Professional Development Workshop. Understanding the Revised Common Rule and ASA Code of Ethics – What

Has Changed for Sociologists?

Pennsylvania Convention Center, 111A, Level 100, 4:30-6:10pm

Session Organizer: John M. Kennedy, Indiana University

Co-Leaders: Thomas L. Van Valey, Western Michigan University

Felice J. Levine, American Educational Research Association

This workshop will review the recent changes to the Common Rule and the ASA Code of Ethics with a focus on their impacts on sociological research. The attendees will learn about the changes and discuss how the changes affect their research and the research of other sociologists. The goal is to provide sociologists with a better understanding of the changes so they can continue to conduct ethical research that meets the requirements of both the federal regulations and the ASA Code of Ethics. The workshop will not cover all changes in the Common Rule or the Code of Ethics but focus on those that most affect sociological research. Common Rule, Changes to expedited reviews, New consent statements, Anticipation of data sharing, Changes to exempt declarations, Minor deception research, Anticipation of data sharing, Flexibility for exempt data collection, Changes to continuing review, Sharing data, ASA Code of Ethics, Confidentiality, Informed consent statements, Planning research for data sharing, Managing research under both the Common Rule and the Code of Ethics, Areas where both are harmonized, Areas where the Common Rule and the Code of Ethics differ, Activities, Selected case studies presented for attendee discussion, Attendee questions on research issues that focus on specific problems followed by a group discussion

This open dialogue forum examines conditions in Puerto Rico and among Puerto Ricans on the island and stateside. The open discussion seeks to generate ideas and strategies for addressing social issues on the island pre- and post-Hurricane Maria (e.g. colonialism, austerity, housing, employment, education, and health) as well issues affecting the diaspora. The discussion also seeks to address a lacking academic attention to Puerto Rico and Puerto Ricans, particularly in U.S. sociology. Topics for collective discussion include: 1. Where is Puerto Rico and its people at almost a year after Hurricane Maria hit? 2. How can sociologists address issues in Puerto Rico that were magnified and exposed by or that emerged from the storm? 3. How can we as sociologists use our knowledge and resources to support communities in and outside of Puerto Rico? 4. In what ways can institutions (e.g. universities, foundations, research centers, and journals) support conducting and disseminating research on Puerto Rico and Puerto Ricans in the island and the mainland? 5. How can we place Puerto Rico on the academic radar, particularly of ASA and its membership going forward? How can we take this moment as an opportunity to forge new bonds between us and sociologists on the island? The goal of the session is to generate ideas and strategies that may be adopted to deal with existing as well as social problems exacerbated by the hurricane.

Legal Structures, Institutions, Racialization Practices and the Immigrant Self Cecilia Menjivar, University of Kansas

Theories of migration and immigrant incorporation tie successful integration to “benchmarks” of assimilation, such as educational and occupational attainment, language acquisition, civic engagement, and intermarriage, among other measurable outcomes. Assimilation research often focuses on these outcomes, as well as a diminishing ethnic identity. Often neglected from theorization from within migration and incorporation theories is the role of emotions and the self. What does the study of emotions tell us about the processes of incorporation? Given the increasingly hostile reception for immigrants across European countries and the United States, a greater emphasis on national borders, and calls for barring “unassimilable” immigrants, how can the study of immigrant emotions and self serve as a conduit to understanding larger social, political, and cultural processes and how individuals negotiate these? Questions that this panel will consider are: how might immigrants’ hopes for, and pursuit of a better life abroad, interact with perceptions of societal acceptance or rejection? How do mechanisms of inclusion and exclusion related to social inequalities result in emotions such as love, hate, or ambivalence? How do competing emotions factor into understanding how immigrants navigate the terrain of settlement? How are lived experiences, as captured in immigrant emotions, linked to patterns of settlement, transnational experiences, and various states of belonging? In light of evidence suggesting an increase in “return migration”, how do emotions factor into resettlement? This panel will advance theorizing the role of emotions in migration and incorporation research to address these questions and devise directions for future research that take into account immigrants’ subjectivities.

From standup comedy to standing around the office water cooler, and from 19th century blackface minstrel shows to modern day fraternity house “racial” parties, race has long played an important role in the social production of humor. Scholars of humor, meanwhile, have long known and shown that the line between racial play, and racist joke telling, is blurred and often transgressed. This Special Session Submission for the 2018 ASA aims to explore how positive effects, including joy, pleasure, happiness, and even community, are produced, circulated, and distributed through humor, and the role these affects play in enabling and constraining dominant racial ideologies. We will also examine how negative effects, such as othering, exclusion and anxiety are coexisting features and byproducts of race based humor. Papers in this session will examine the intersections of humor, migration and racialization, how race based jokes and cartoons reinforce and disrupt dominant racial ideologies, the prevalence of racist humor in an ostensibly colorblind society, and the relation between racial humor and ‘serious’ discourses and ideologies of race.
